i grew up in the mountains of dagestan in a land where every day was a challenge where strength was not measured by muscles but by resilience there my father taught me that the most important fight in life doesn't happen in the octagon but within ourselves he said it doesn't matter how many fights you win it matters how you live it stayed with me every step of my journey i trained in conditions that would make many give up but these difficulties were not obstacles they were opportunities in that makeshift gymnasium where the floor was hard and the walls were cold i learned that comfort is the enemy of progress we trained hard because we knew that life doesn't offer shortcuts to success the effort you put in today is the legacy you leave tomorrow i have always said that honor is more important than victory you can win a thousand battles but if you lose your dignity what have you really gained in the octagon i fought with respect for my opponents because in the end we're all just human outside of it i lived with respect for my principles because they are what define who i am
