chapter one aunt janet s visit up to the fifth landing and then straight on you canna miss the door for a moment the person thus addressed stood gazing up into the darkness of the narrow staircase and then turned wearily to the steep ascent no wonder she was weary for at the dawn of that long august day now closing so dimly over the smoky town her feet had pressed the purple heather on the hills that skirt the little village of kirklands a neighbouring farmer had driven her part of the way but she had walked since then seven and twenty miles of the distance that lay between her and her home but it was not weariness alone that deepened the shadow on her brow as she passed slowly upwards uncertainty with regard to the welfare of dear friends had long been taking the form of anxious fears and now her fears were rapidly changing into a certainty of evil her heart sickened within her as she breathed the hot stifling air for she knew that her only brother s orphan children had breathed no other air than that during the long hot weeks of summer at length she reached the door to which she had been directed and as she stood for a moment before it the prayer that had often risen in her heart that day burst in strong brief words from her lips there was no sound in the room and it was some time before her eyes became accustomed to the dim light around her then the glimpse she caught through the half open door of one or two familiar objects the desk which had been her father s and the high backed chair of carved oak in which her mother used to sit so many many years ago assured her that she had reached her journey's end on a low bed just opposite the door through which she gazed lay a boy apparently about ten years of age his face was pale and thin and he moved his head uneasily on his pillow as though very weary or in pain for a time all sense of fatigue was forgotten by the traveller so occupied was she in tracing in that fair little face a resemblance to one dearly beloved in former years her only brother and the father of the child suddenly he raised himself up and leaning his head upon his hand spoke to some one in another part of the room oh me oh me he said faintly the time seems so long surely she must be coming now it's saturday night you ken said a soft voice in reply she can't be home quite so soon to night but the shadow of the speir has got round to the yew tree at the gate and it won't be long now the little head sank back on the pillow again and there was a pause oh me he murmured again it seems so long i wish it was all at an end what do you wish was at an end said the same low voice again all these long days and my mother's going out when she's not able to go and you sewing so busy all the day and me waiting waiting never to be well again oh lily i wish i was dead there was the sound of a light step on the floor and a little girl's grave pale face bent over the boy
